About Kanha National Park

Kanha Tiger Reserve is spread over an area of 1,949 sq.km. (940 sq.km. of core area and 1,009 sq.km. of buffer zone), making it one of the best habitats for tigers in India. The park is situated in the Central Indian Highlands, which are part of the extensive tableland that forms India's main peninsula. The highlands once were continuous forests and accounted for a significant part of a country's wilderness areas and wildlife habitat.

Kanha's breathtaking landscape is adorned with dense groves of vegetation, hillocks and meadows. It's meadows sustain some of the most unique and endangered species of Chital, Sambar, Barasingha and Gaur, which in turn support the population of predators and co-predators (Tigers, Leopards, Wild Dogs, Jungle Cats and Foxes). The park is primarily a mixed deciduous forest featuring Sal, Bamboo, Tendu, Jamun, Arjun and Lendia. It shelters over 1,000 species of flowering plants and about 300 species of birds.

Moreover, Kanha's beauty had been an inspiration to Rudyard Kipling for his famous narrative, 'The Jungle Book'. The reserve has also proved helpful in the preservation of Hard Ground Swamp Deer or Barasingha from near extinction (they numbered just 66 in 1970). Today, they number more than 400 and are the only surviving population of Barasingha in the wild.
